Logistically, downsizing the wedding wasn't a huge hassle for the couple. They still used the same flowers as originally planned, and were able to cancel the food order for the 250 people who were supposed to attend.

A small number of chairs were set up on the family's lawn for those few who were in attendance Friday. The wedding was live-streamed on the father of the bride's Facebook account for all wishing to watch the ceremony.

With both Williams and her fiancé Horn having older relatives who would need to travel, it didn't seem safe to go on as planned.

"It was difficult for my dad and we wanted him to walk me down the aisle," Williams said.

The pandemic hasn't stopped local couples from getting marriage licenses for future weddings, or getting married on the spot at the courthouse. In fact, those numbers rose this week, according to Jefferson County Clerk Carolyn Guidry.

Her office gave out 10 licenses alone on Monday and stayed busier than usual throughout the week. The only people allowed in the courthouse are those getting marriage licenses or background checks for jobs.

"It was like everyone wanted each other's last name before the world ends," Guidry said. "It was almost comical how many people were coming in."

As for Wright and Moore, the couple had planned to take a trip to the Bahamas for their honeymoon but decided to cancel. Instead, they'll have a "staycation" in the days following Friday's wedding.

"There was kind of no point in us going because everything is going to be shut down anyway, so we figured we'd just stay home," Moore said. "We went and bought some
